

Carers discrimination

What is carers discrimination?

Carers discrimination is against the law at work. It is when you have been treated less favourably because of your responsibilities as a carer.

The law protects people who support or care for:

- their child (including a stepchild, adopted child or foster child)
- a child or adult for whom they are a guardian
- a family member.

Indirect discrimination is also against the law. This is when a rule or requirement is the same for everyone but unfairly affects people who have responsibilities as a carer, and is not reasonable in the circumstances.

Where is carers discrimination against the law?

Carers discrimination is against the law in certain public places, including:

- workplaces, such as when you apply for a job or while you are at work
- employment agencies, such as when you use recruitment companies
- industrial organisations, such as membership of a union
- qualifying bodies, such as an institute which issues qualifications

Complaint case study

Jason* is a primary carer for his wife who has epilepsy. His wife regularly had severe seizures, so occasionally Jason had to leave work urgently and return home to look after her.

Jason was transferred to a new work location over an hour away from home. When Jason spoke to his manager, he was told that he did not apply for jobs closer to home, which Jason disputed. Jason had tried very hard to find a job within his organisation that was closer to home.

Jason lodged a complaint of carer's discrimination with ADNSW.

During conciliation, the complaint was resolved when the employer agreed to transfer Jason back to his original work location.
