

Homosexual discrimination

What is homosexual discrimination?

Homosexual discrimination is when you have been treated unfairly because:

- you are gay or lesbian or someone thinks you are gay or lesbian
- you are the relative, friend or colleague of someone who is gay or lesbian.

Indirect discrimination is also against the law. This is when a rule or requirement is the same for everyone but unfairly affects people who are gay or lesbian, and is not reasonable in the circumstances.

Where is homosexual discrimination against the law?

Homosexual discrimination is against the law in certain public places, including:

- workplaces, such as when you apply for a job or while you are at work
- employment agencies, such as when you use recruitment companies
- when you access goods and services, such as when you go shopping, do your banking or access medical services
- state education, such as when you apply for study and during your studies
- accommodation, such as when you rent accommodation
- industrial organisations, such as membership of a union
- qualifying bodies, such as an institute which issues qualifications
- at registered clubs, such as when you try to enter or join a club that sells alcohol or has gambling machines.

Complaint case study

Janine* applied for a rental accommodation with a real estate agent.

Janine was refused the accommodation when she informed the real estate agent that she was intending to live with her female partner.

Janine lodged a complaint of homosexual discrimination with ADNSW.

ADNSW contacted the agent and explained that discriminating against Janine because of her lesbianism was against the Anti-Discrimination Act.

The complaint was resolved when the agent offered Janine alternative accommodation and agreed to review all the office policies for possible discriminatory practices.
